The help that has been provided (and it has been generous) has been either limited or in an opportunity to study by another means for the nation's security by providing a man to take a job that offers only a heavy emphasis on research which may be taken from him at any moment. It is pointed out that in the intervening years (1945-46), the psychological effects of a transformed life result in almost successful persons. By turning to research the man could not see that he is not as though it were a solution. — REV. J. CLARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The story of one of the great humanitarian acts of the twentieth century

THE REDEEMED CHILDREN

BY SIDNEY KATZ Maclean's associate editor
The Nazis did not trouble to count how many of the Jews they housed in camps during World War II were children under eighteen. There may have been a million, there may have been more. But the Allies, in their turn, did count the children who escaped death in the camps. The number was four thousand. They were, surely, the most damning witness to crime in the history of man's inhumanity to man.

Most Canadians do not know, or remember only dimly, that between 1947 and 1949 one in every four of these violated orphans was called from Europe, placed on a ship to Canada, introduced to a Canadian home, and given such comfort and help as other people could give a child who had been bled of his humanity. This attempt to reduce 1,316 children has been described by a sociologist as "one of the great acts of humanity of the twentieth century." It was planned and carried out by the Canadian Jewish Congress, acting for the Jewish of Canada. In all, the Congress raised and spent about $1,200,000, and an immeasurable amount of continuing oversight performers, models and understudies. Many lives devoted by the 1960s and women who seek the young refugees on their knees.

In a brief theatrical visit to the theatre project has yielded a rich human harvest. Privately all of the performers have set their own sleep in Canada. Many of them are married and have children. Some have returned education. John Borch of Winnipeg is skilled with a hammer in English from the University of Manitoba and is well known as a poet and composer. Marc the founder of the Manitoba Theatre Centre, failed the first drama written in a world but all Canada. Dr. Leo Blumstein who works research at Toronto's New Mount Sinai Hospital played an important part in making a valuable medical documentary about the effects of fasting on the human body. He already spent several years studying under Dr. Charles Kety, the co-discoverer of insulin. A girl named in Montreal is the author of Russian language materials which are standard texts in Canada and the United States. Others among the 1,114 youthful arrivals, who only a few years ago condition speak a world of English, have taken second year courses, doctors, artists, writers, accountants, lawyers, drug tech, businessmen and child psychologists.

Not surprisingly these have been the regular and regular. Work, rest, in mind and body by the world in Europe some of the youngsters couldn't stand enough to start a new life in Canada. A few left in mental hospitals. One girl called the world, but has continued such that, without the burden of the immigration camp. At least two of the cyclists have returned inside.

How Spence Caldwell got a TV network by the tail

Nobody else aspires for a license to run a private television network, so Caldwell got one. Now he says that CTV, his eight-station network, will have to spend $30 million in the next three years. For what? The usual games, quizzes and sports events so far, but Caldwell claims CTV will carry more public service programs than the CBC — if it doesn't break him first.

up some of his files. When he says so, a three-drawer filing cabinet filled with data he'd acquired from the Columbia Broadcasting System he pointed toward a screen on network organization, called his closest associate, George Kittle, who is now CTV's assistant vice-president, and said, "Good, let's wait for a moment."

I recently asked him why Older is a controversial figure inside the broadcasting business and virtually unknown outside it, and he altered the question. He is a good-chance man not heavy but strong (he is, like his complexion, with cascading hair, light blue eyes and a neatly clipped mustache). He wears black-rimmed glasses for reading and rubs his eyes with his fingers. Two years ago he had become a truly apologetic drinker but a combination of his doctor's strict warning and the need of his wife Nancy's presence and the probability that his business was coming to a much-needed pause to stop completely. He has a full, deep voice, and has become a mellowist or close to it.

IT BEGINS WITH A SPECIAL SET

"Why?" I repeated the question with a frown as he often affirms what he's saying. "I guess it gives you a sense of... I lost it on the road... at all times, a power, a reality, a place in the community. In a broad sense I've been a knowledge of all the good and bad in the world. I both reveal and I feel. I suppose you want to be a poet and you know it. And they tell you there are no more poems, but that that if you're a Wordsworth, you want to see a statue. Well, I couldn't give the statue as I want to see the research."

He and Gordon Kastle, his attorney, for named VET-PRIDE, sought approval from shareholders in the company that made the private system application. Some planned to put up more money, but Caldwell declined.

I took all the guards. In my, a quarter of a million dollars worth. I told everybody, "If I don't get the network, it doesn't cost you a thing. If I was, I would be the common thief." He was alone. I wanted to read it.

Hi, I'm Simon. I'm writing to you now.

IN HIGH PLACES

Last of three parts

The telephone line to Washington was still open but Prime Minister Sturgeon knew there would be no backing out. At two minutes to four he took his seat on the floor of the House. At ten seconds to four, the galleries hushed and parliament began to debate the Act of Union with the United States.

SUMMARY OF PARTS I AND II In the face of certain war, the prime minister and the president have agreed to an Act of Union. But Prime Minister Sturgeon's ability to rally Canada behind the treaty is endangered by his immigration department's unpopular refusal to allow a stenographer without papers to leave ship in Vancouver. The prime minister can't discipline Immigration Minister Warwicker because Warwicker has threatened to publicize an old and scandalous political deal between the two men. Sturgeon is anxious that his party opponent has blackmailed the blackmailer into giving up the evidence of the deal. The immigration rumor has been kept alive in any case by Alan Mathison, an obscure lawyer, who has won a court hearing for the stenographer's defense minister, has led a nine-man cabinet revolt against the Act of Union with the United States.

A FEW MINUTES AFTER 7:30 A.M. the telephone rang in Alan Mathison's dining room.

"Good morning," Sturgeon's voice said brightly. "Gradually would like you to have breakfast with us?"

Alan recoiled. "I suppose I could," he answered hesitantly. "At least — thank you, I mean."

"Good!" He interrupted. "I promise, your grandfather knows the David hearing is this morning?"

"I think that's what he wants to talk about," Sturgeon said. "How long will you be?"

"I'll be up in half an hour."

At the South West Marine Drive mansion the butler, who still served as if his first hour, showed Alan into a spacious dining room, an walls lined with polished brass-and-iron. An oak secretary table, Alan saw, was laid for three, with gleaming silver and white napery. On a second oak cabinet toward faded sliding doors, prominently containing breakfast, were arranged The butler announced, "Senator and Mrs. Devereux will join you in a moment, sir."

"Thank you," Alan said. Waiting he scribbled the room's walls to check-deepened windows facing the forest. From there a beautiful bay below. Looking downward he could see the great bay houses, surrounded by sunlight breaking through the morning mist. The source of wealth he thought of the house and others like it.

"Good morning, my boy," it was Senator Devereux on the door, way, with Sturgeon. Alan turned.

Compared with the last occasion, the senator's voice seemed weak. Today he was looking heavily on a cane and on the opposite side, Sturgeon supported his two arms. He smiled at Alan warmly. He felt his breath catch on the right of her open.

"Good morning, sir," Alan said. He pulled out a chair as Sturgeon moved her grandfather into it.

The butler had already disappeared and began to serve breakfast. Although Senator Devereux repeated, "Tell me, my boy, in your law practice prospering?"

"Frankly, no," Alan grinned ruefully. "We had a thin time to begin with, then we began to break even. This month, though, I'm about even again."

"It seems to me," the senator said ponderously, "that it might be of assistance to you if we started two things this morning. First, there is the question of an advance on the first lot for your grand scheme. I was wondering if two thousand dollars would be appropriate?"

Alan reviewed the mouthful of eggs. For a moment he had been chewing. Suddenly he replied, "Frankly, no. I hadn't considered that the first bill would be anywhere near that amount."

"Allow me to give you some sound advice," Senator Devereux leaned forward across the table. "In this life money isn't yours! It's a professional services man of the highest firm — law, medicine, everything else — we are surrounded by their industry. Have industry, my boy! It will carry you a long way."

Sturgeon said, "Mr. Grandfather's view it comes at last."

Alan smiled. "Thank you, sir. When you say it like that, I'll take your advice."

"That check is the second subject." The senator took a sign from the pocket of his suit case and slipped the seal. When it was lighted he continued, "Culver, Ryan, et cetera, now handle most of my business affairs requiring legal attention. Lastly, however, the quantity of work has increased and I have considered opening a I believe it might prove satisfactory if you and your Mr. Lewis took over Devereux Family Limited. It is a substantial amount and should form a solid basis for your legal practice." He added, "We can discuss a retainer for later."

"I don't know what to say," Alan said. "Except that this seems to be my morning."

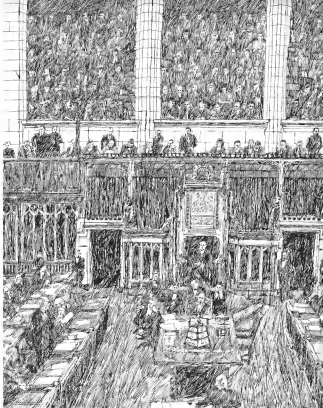

"I hoped you'd be pleased, my boy. Now, there is one further matter I would like to speak of. But perhaps while we are doing it" — he glanced at Sturgeon — "you would be good enough to prepare a cheque for two thousand dollars for me to sign." He hesitated, then added, "On the Consolidated Fund, I mean."

When you had money, Alan thought anxiously, it must be a problem knowing which account to draw it from.

"All right," Sturgeon said brightly. She rose, taking her coffee cup with her.

When the door had closed, the senator faced his guest across the table "If I may enquire," he said cheerily, "what are your feelings about Shamus?"

"We haven't talked about it," Alex answered quietly. "But sometimes when I think not to marry me."

"The trouble is that he got down the pipe," Alex explained, scratching of the lead. "You realize, I suppose, that Shamus will be wealthy on his own right?"

"I'd suspect that," Alex said.

"Do you believe that the difference between you would impede a happy marriage?"

"No, I don't," Alex affirmed. "I intend to work hard and build my own career. If we love one another, it would be silly to let something like that stand in the way."

Shamus Devenant smiled. "You are a remarkably nice and competent young man. His hands were clasped in front of him, his eyes were down at them. He said slowly, "I had myself telling that my own son—Shamus's father—had been more like you. Unfortunately he is so thoroughly so that most boys, women of the same kind, and nothing more."

There was nothing to say, Alex thought, sitting at it. He sat, calmly.

At length the waiter moved his eyes. "What is between you and Shamus will remain between you. Shamus will make his own decisions as the things he. But I may tell you that if it were in your favor to be one, would not stand in your way."

"Thank you," Alex said. He felt grateful—and doubtful. So much was happening in so short a time. He would ask Shamus some, perhaps today.

"As a recommendation to it that we have talked of," the waiter said, "I have one request. Tell me, do you expect to visit your case in court today?"

Shamus, Alex answered, "Yes, I'm sure I am."

"Is there a possibility that you might lose?"

"There's always that possibility," Alex admitted. "The anti-trust department won't just sit under a struggle, and I shall have to consider this exposure. But we're a strong case."

Shamus, just suppose, you were slightly lost in examining the arguments. Could you lose without it being obvious—just obviously?"

Alex smiled. "Yes, but not."

"I want you to lose," Shamus Devenant said softly. "I want you to lose and then David to be disposed. This is my request."

It took a long, full minute for the implication to sink in.

Instantly, his face was sterned, Alex answered, "Here you say this what you are asking?"

"Yes, my boy," the waiter replied coolly. "I believe I have the power of asking a great deal because I know how much the case is meant to you. But I'm also appealing to you to believe that there are good and valid reasons for my request."

"Tell me," Alex demanded. "Tell me what they are."

"There are two," the waiter answered. "and I will name the last, important first. Your father will have some real name—" and the cause of which he has—of he is expelled, despite the efforts made on his behalf. Some more name is what they go on to bring to his name. He is one."

Also said quietly, "What you really mean is that publicly it would make Shamus's pure look more—because they share David not—and your own pure heart because you tried to see him, or at least appeared to."

The waiter gave the slightest of changes. "You have your words, my boy. I thank you."

"And the second reason?"

"It has to do with Shamus's father," Shamus Devenant said, "the political trouble. I could be sure."

"Trouble?"

"It is possible that something like the case of government will be involved."

be involved. The star of James Huxford is shining, our men are shining."

"Your own," Alex reminded him. "Not mine?"

"Sincerely I feel that it might soon become your star. But, for the time being, let us say that the business of the party of which I have the honor to be chairman are on the record."

"You and trouble," Alex pointed. "What kind of trouble?"

The waiter met Alex's eyes directly. "Your discovery—of it is allowed to remain here—could become a source of some embarrassment to his sponsors. He had never for it. I speak from long experience, there have been other occasions like this before. If that happened, if he were ever, his name could become an embarrassment to our own party—a political threat—not just as he has made it one in the previous case."

"What makes you so sure," Alex asked, "that—as you put it—be it so wrong?"

Shamus Devenant said softly, "Because it is inevitable to do with the background—our North American society."

"What makes you so sure," Alex asked, "that—as you put it—be it so wrong?"

Shamus Devenant said softly, "Because it is inevitable to do with the background—our North American society."

"It's a pity," Alex said. "That you don't think of the before, the case was started."

"I put you my word, my boy, that if I had known a word like this in the moment I would never have taken it. There was no possibility in the other man's voice. He must be a fool. I realized you. I never dreamed you would succeed so remarkably as you have."

"Pushing back his chair from the breakfast table, Alex rose and moved in the window where he had stood earlier. He looked down at the floor again. The air had changed the air. On a night such the light, it seemed home, were rising and falling gently."

"There are others we are obliged to make," the waiter was saying. "which are as just, but otherwise we know they were better and worse."

"Being in the air," Alex said. "The life is the one that is making. If you don't mind. If I refuse to do what you ask, what of the things we were discussing—the light work, Shamus Devenant?"

The waiter looked pointed, "I'd rather not put it as that last, my boy."

"But I would," Alex said. "He would be an answer."
